[FULL][Portable]The 8-bit NES had a catchy theme song, with a catchy tambourine beat that fit the gameplay perfectly, and added a whole new element of gameplay to the platform game. But when Nintendo was developing the NES, one of the defining aspects of gaming wasn't so clear. The NES was designed to play games in black and white, but many games were developed in color. The programmers were encouraged to use color at will, so the different sections of the screen could be painted in a variety of colors, and a game that would have been a simple 2D scrolling platform game with black backgrounds and a single color enemy could be turned into a 3D platform game with a variety of enemies in a variety of colors. The NES chip itself couldn't really handle all of the full-color graphics, so the designers could only run 4 colors of graphics at once. But most of the developers didn't want to be constrained to that low resolution, so they decided to map each of the colors from the various sections of the screen to their own color code. It was a clunky hack, but it allowed them to use color freely. In the original NES, the palette was arranged with eight total colors. The top eight sections of the screen were each mapped to one of
