Taken together, however, these pieces paint a picture of a new reality in which a country that until recently waged a two-decade-long war against the Taliban, has become so insecure that it now has the greatest number of refugees in the world. “The US is going to spend billions on training Afghan security forces, so we can not be seen to be reducing the US troop numbers,” said a member of the US Defense Department. “Our exit strategy is to keep the US troop numbers down, but then leave behind a very strong Afghan security force so that US troops are not needed.” People fleeing the Taliban and violence between members of the security forces have fled across the border into Pakistan, an event that the Obama administration is eager to downplay. The administration recently responded to accusations that their withdrawal schedule is timed to coincide with an expected US presidential election in November by saying that the draw-down is not being accelerated due to Afghan voters supporting President Karzai's re-election bid. "The Afghan government and US forces have won the war, with Afghan security forces increasing their capabilities," said one US official. "The Taliban has no chance of winning." The growing number of refugees from Afghanistan is further adding to pressure on Pakistan, the primary point of arrival for refugees fleeing Afghanistan's long war. President Obama launched a program to provide Afghanistan's refugees a visa to work in the US, the first such offer in more than six decades. The program, however, has come under fire in recent weeks over fears that the program will bring many more refugees to the US. Republicans have argued that granting Afghan refugees a path to live in the US would lead to a substantial increase in the number of refugees coming to the US. The number of refugees fleeing Afghanistan and Pakistan has climbed steadily since the US and NATO invaded Afghanistan in 2001.

The purpose of this study was to compare the two currently available radiopharmaceuticals, gallium-67 citrate (G-67) and In-111 oxine, as well as the two technics, planar and single-photon emission computed tomography (SPECT), in the diagnosis and follow-up of patients with primary biliary cirrhosis (PBC). Twenty-five patients with biopsy-proved PBC underwent hepatic scintigraphy with G-67 and In-111 oxine. All patients subsequently underwent a laparotomy for explorative laparoscopy to obtain liver biopsies. All patients were followed-up for a mean period of 14 months (range: 12-16 months) after scintigraphy. Scintigraphy was interpreted as being positive for PBC if a focal hepatic accumulation of G-67 or In-111 oxine persisted or was seen at follow-up. Nineteen of the 25 patients were positive for PBC. Of the four patients with a negative G-67 scan, three underwent laparotomy with biopsy-proven PBC, whereas the fourth patient refused surgery. In six of the 25 patients, liver biopsy revealed PBC but scintigraphy was negative. The sensitivity of G-67 (89%), the specificity of In-111 oxine (86%), and the accuracy of G-67 (89%) and In-111 oxine (86%) were comparable. G-67 scintigraphy is as effective as In-111 oxine scintigraphy in the diagnosis and follow-up of
