You must figure out how to escape from the castle and survive for a longer time than others by solving quests and fighting bosses. You can fight or try other characters, or even just hide in rooms and enjoy the atmosphere of a real ghost town. During the night, everyone will act differently and not forget the events of the previous day. While you are hiding, one of your friends is hunting you down. You want to discover who is he before it's too late. Who will survive?

Sitter model above, we cannot obtain the best fit to the observed radial curves without reweighting the outcomes. We again find that the best fit values of the transition redshifts  $z_1=2.35$  and  $z_2=3.25$ , and the matter era Hubble parameter at  $z=0.7$   $h_0=0.70$ , are well reproduced. The best fit values for the new values of  $\Omega_0=0.31$  and  $\Omega_0+\Omega_{\Lambda}=0.69$  are  $\bar{w}_0=-0.91$  and  $\bar{w}_1=-0.13$ . We then reproduce the characteristic curve shown in Fig. 5 from (Broussé et al. 1992), which clearly shows a concentration of more than 90 halos at  $z \sim 0.7$  due to first infall. This leaves us free to set  $M=3 \times 10^{13} h^{-1} M_{\odot}$  independent of this particular choice of the cosmological parameters. Discussion =====
In this paper we have studied the differences due to a general causal set theory between the dynamics of the linear structure formation and the evolution of the collapse and virialization of the collapsed halos without adopting a spherical cosmology. The general tree structure of a simple causal set differs considerably from that of an FLRW model of spacetime. In a causal set, two remote points are never connected by a line, and so, for example, two points do not have the triangle inequality. A third point can always lie interior to or exterior to them, but not between them. In these respects the causal structure is closer to that of hyperbolic geometry (where not only the triangular inequality but also the completeness of the relation  $x_0$
