The University of California, Berkeley, is a place where liberal ideas flourish. But its top administrator believes that the increasingly widespread use of the term "microaggressions" to describe subtle expressions of bias may harm public perception. "Microaggressions aren't really about race, they're about certain patterns of behavior," the university's chancellor, Nicholas Dirks, wrote in an op-ed for the Washington Post on Tuesday. Microaggressions, the term coined by a black professor in the 1980s, refer to unwanted, stereotyped, racist, or sexist nonverbal remarks. Although they are not necessarily overtly racist, they can have the effect of reinforcing a white male status quo, according to Peter Fisher, a professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara. Microaggressions, he said, are a "technical problem" in the use of diversity and inclusion, as they raise concerns that racial or ethnic "outsiders" are being labeled for performing seemingly innocuous behaviors. In his op-ed, Dirks voiced concern about the use of microaggressions in UC Berkeley. In 2012, his office hired University of Michigan sociologist Mark J. Wood to conduct a comprehensive study of campus issues. In a subsequent report, Wood suggested that UC Berkeley was a "microaggression hotspot." The upshot was a recommendation to "develop a set of guidelines

"The right to vote is one of the most powerful weapons in the fight for freedom." - Mario Savio While in college I volunteered to serve a local state representative. The House of Representative offered free tuition to the college of the person who made the volunteer service. They had a mix of Democrats and Republicans and of course they had a lot of liberals. There were at least three African American candidates. I volunteered to canvass those three African American candidates. Two of them were African American and one was Irish. We canvassed with the other volunteers and several volunteers who were very liberal. One of my fellow canvassers was African American, another was Asian, and one Irish. The African American was voted the following week and the Asian was voted the second week. The
