There is increasing evidence that neuropeptides affect the age-related modulation of the immune system. We describe an age-dependent, functional down-regulation of receptors for the neurokinin 1 (NK-1) receptor, a major tachykinin receptor in the central nervous system. A characteristic of NK-1 receptors is the distinctive up-and-down regulation of their expression in the hippocampus and cerebral cortex. To investigate this regulation, we studied the kinetics of its emergence and decline in the aged hippocampus. The NK-1 receptor mRNA initially appeared at 3 months of age (minimal age in this model), and its level increased considerably between 3 and 9 months of age. At that time, its level dropped down precipitously, reaching minimal values at 15 months. This down-regulation was associated with a decreased capacity of basal NK-1 receptors to mobilize extracellular Ca²⁺. The age at which the receptor is first expressed in the hippocampus may reflect its functional role. The receptor underwent much of its down-regulation in the first year of life, which may signify the importance of its expression in the early developmental stages. The aberrant NK-1 receptor expression in aged animals may be the product of a deterioration of the regulated processes that normally control the expression of NK-1 receptors in the young.
