Rock Band 2 is one of the best-selling video game franchises ever and the US President Donald Trump has called North Korea's recent test of a rocket that could be used to mount a nuclear warhead "very provocative," but his call for countries to "prevent" Pyongyang from developing nuclear weapons has drawn heavy criticism from experts who note there is no evidence the rogue regime has actually decided to abandon its pledge to do just that. "I think it is very provocative and obviously the response is going to be very severe," Mr Trump said on Tuesday, in remarks to reporters, hours after Pyongyang launched a Hwasong-14 rocket. "We're not playing games. North Korea has acted very badly, they have not been following the agreements made by the past agreements. This has not been easy for the past. "North Korea's a very tough situation, it's very sad. We're dealing with a very, very dangerous regime." South Korea's spy agency and its main nuclear experts have said the rocket was carrying a satellite, but Mr Trump described it as a "missile". North Korea is believed to have enough material to build a nuclear-tipped missile capable of reaching the United States. Its eight most recent launches have been banned under United Nations Security Council resolutions, but it has defied those restrictions by launching five rockets since July 4. The launch comes as Washington and Pyongyang appear to be moving toward a possible deal on denuclearisation. At a news conference with Mr Trump at the start of this month, the North's leader, Kim Jong-un, said the country would "gladly" give up its nuclear weapons if the United States took "corresponding measures". Analysts say those measures
