7 Answers from the Community After reading the answers and seeing all of the great ideas, I decided to go with Blackstone electric sprinkler systems. We have 4 acres and an approximately 18' deep irrigation well. We initially had an electronic controller that was prone to overheating which we finally found the cause and promptly replaced it with a solid controller that doesn't overheat. Still, when we go to flush a sprinkler, it takes four hours to get the pressure of the well back down to the point where it can activate the sprinkler. It's become an issue with the property owner and we still haven't figured out what the issue is. We are also dealing with an extended drought now and I'm concerned about water usage at this point. We also have up to 20 spaces that are over-sprinkled and working with the well owner and contractor, we are trying to make this work. Our zones are zone 4 to 16 (each zone has a logic control, pop-up, and oscillating sprinkler). We have a Zone4 zone with three oscillating sprinklers that are manually set. A Zone5 is set to a logic control with a loop and all spaces in that zone are set to loop. Zone 6 has a logic control and all zones in zone 6 are set to loop. Zone 7 is set to a pop-up as are all the zones in zone 8. Zone 9 is set to an oscillating sprinkler as are the zones in zone 10. Zone 11 is set to oscillate. Zone 12 is set to pulsate and is a single zone. Zone 13 is set to pulsate. Zone 14 is set to oscillate. Zone 15 is set to a pop-up. Zone 16 is set to an oscillating sprinkler. Of those zones, 12 is the largest area. I thought I was going to be running a sizeable lot with lots of space, but as it turns out the property owner wanted to do all the landscaping himself, which is proving to be a problem. It's large and a 25,000 square foot lot. He also bought the house with its own well and will be using the pump (which is good) but the well pressure isn't high enough to really allow for us to properly time the backflow. I am very concerned about water usage and using the lot as efficiently as possible. I'm very familiar with water consumption and have used that to make decisions on our commercial landscaping. We're looking to install Green BioSeed (very high efficiency)
