Real Estate Association recently reported a cooling in the market, partially due to over-building across the province. Regardless of the cause, the supply of housing remains just out of the reach of many Canadians. The result is prices keep climbing. Indeed, in the three months to October, the annualized price growth was 8.7 per cent and the average price was up 11.1 per cent. All this means there are increasing numbers of people who are at risk of being priced out. During the recent bull run the real estate industry profited immensely from the indulgent nature of governments. Banks were giving out mortgages like confetti. At the same time, governments were subsidizing housing, most notably, through their much lauded “affordability” programs. Those programs have come under scrutiny and indeed they have been discredited. Those who argued for them did so on the basis that they would prop up prices in the long-run. I would argue that it is not the government's role to prop up prices but, rather, to ensure that everyone who needs a place to live can get one. In many markets around the world — notably the U.S., Australia and
