What's new in Wrecked! Unfair Car Stunts:

In Need of Smash-Fixing Maybe you've seen a car stunt on the news. You know, the kind where the guy jumps out of the cab or drops a car onto, say, a brick wall, taking the wall and all its inhabitants with it. Well, the people in those news reports aren't saying a word against the stunt heroes. They're definitely enjoying the ride, thanks to the remarkable engineering that goes into the stunt van, because the stunt hero is obviously a skilled driver (er, whatever). But because they're so skilled, they make the stuntmen say, "That wasn't something I could've done." Well, I personally don't want to watch any more stunt footage because I'm scared I'll learn some secret move that I can't undo. So I propose to quote Fordham Driver and Driver's Ed veteran Betty Sara Louise, who says "Storytelling is so important in life." If we're going to watch a stunt, we need to find out who's behind it: the stuntman or the driver, right? I like to think of my car stunts as being safety net techniques. I've borrowed other stunt professionals' stunts that I've then totally improved upon. But too often, when the stunt turns out successful, the whole stunt's called a success, even though somebody's livelihood may have depended on it. Knowing all of this, my goal is to help you avoid stunts that don't work. I want to help you avoid stunt scenes in which your car's 20 feet ahead of its brakes. I want to protect you from props that are going to burn your guts. And most of all, I want you to know that you can do your own stunts. In addition, though, I'd like to share some tips that will improve your own stunts and help you when filming those scenes. I'll start with the different types of stunts. Background Types: Suspension Stunts In Suspension stunts, your wheels are suspended above your car's body, and you jump the distance between the two. If you've ever done a motorcycle jump, you probably remember how scary the ground felt when it surprised you with the fact that you were no longer airborne. Suspension stunts are just that: stunts where the car's in mid-air, a car-high. Suspension stunts are challenging because they require both a good driver and a good stuntman. One common failure is a driver who can
