Episodic Early AccessAs a food writer, I have a lot of assignments. Some are about food trends; others about new ingredients, new restaurants, or new products. I also cover culinary competitions. For my recent assignment, I had to look at the trends in popular food culture: what is the major trend in the world of food and beverage today? First, I consider a person's food beliefs: the way that the food is produced, the ingredients used, the quality level, the eating habits, the value and meaning of food, the ways in which food is regarded as medicine, etc. Then I consider the changes in production, distribution and consumption that have happened in the course of history. In the last century, the rise of farming consolidated as a major trend in the production and consumption of food. Through a mass movement, it changed the way we eat and the way we produce food: crops were domesticated, animals were tamed, and farms emerged. I write that these trends are continuing in the 21st century. In the 1850s in Paris, there were on average 500 meat and 1,600 poultry butcher shops. In the 1990s, there are on average 6,200 meat and 7,500 poultry butcher shops. The increase of butcher shops means that more people eat less meat. In the 1850s, there were 10,000 cheese makers in France. In the 1990s, there are 3,500 cheese makers. This means that even the French eat cheese less today. In the 1850s, it took only five gallons of wine to make 1 gallon of brandy. In the 1990s, it takes 500 gallons of wine to make 1 gallon of brandy. In the 19th century, France was a major producer of wine. However, since the 1970s, it has not been. It is one of the most important wine producers in the world now, and the French wine sector is in the top of most international lists of quality wine. In the 1850s, the staples for humans were bread and cheese. In the 1990s, they are eggs, fish, poultry and meat. The 1890s were an extremely prosperous decade. The major agriculture producing countries were the UK, the USA, France, Germany and Italy. Today, there are economic problems in these countries and they are not powerful enough to influence the world of food. In the beginning of the 19th century, Denmark had the most intensive production of bread
