Developers with the skill set to write significant portions of a Java application can now focus on the highest quality, cross platform features of OpenOffice while writing fewer lines of code in their code base. LibOpenOffice Help: LibOpenOffice - Home: LibOpenOffice User Guide: LIBRIDES General News The use of Reader or Writer documents as the backend application data store for OpenOffice is becoming more popular now that they are becoming more common. For various reasons there is a need to store documents in files in a way other than what the OpenOffice and OpenOffice.org processing is capable of handling. The Lotus Notes database is commonly used in enterprise environments to handle information processing and collaboration of large amounts of data. As business environments are becoming more data and document centric the need to store information about processes in a persistent data store has become evident. Luckily the Lotus Notes database supports importing and exporting the data it needs to handle. This allows information about business processes to be stored in a files and made available for manipulation and reading by the open source database system. There are two interfaces provided to the open source database that are the standart IBM Interbase and the interface provided by Lotus. More information and details can be found in the documentation for the two database systems.
