VIGITS Healthcare Network provides healthcare to children who require intensive health care.. EPub ahead of print.The physiology of puberty: gender differences. During puberty, the onset of puberty varies between gender. Males begin androgens at later ages than females, and the peak age of peak growth velocity occurs at ages that are considerably later than those for females. The main androgen that regulates height growth in both males and females is testosterone, but the ways in which the processes involved in gonadal sex differentiation are regulated by the adrenal-gonadal feedback loop are different. In males, the pituitary secretion of luteinizing hormone, which regulates the maturation of the Leydig cells, is controlled by hypothalamic secretion of gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH) in a process that requires the action of sex steroids. In females, the pituitary secretion of luteinizing hormone is modulated by GnRH and estradiol. Thus, the main difference between the regulation of the two processes is found in the hypothalamus. In addition, in females, the onset of puberty seems to be controlled by the action of the tripeptide somatostatin on hypothalamic secretion of GnRH, since pituitary and adrenal function are regulated by a negative feedback of the hypothalamus on the pituitary gland. Because of the difference in onset of puberty between the genders, pubertal growth in females may be accomplished more rapidly than in males.Q: Is it possible to specify a before delete for a foreign key constraint in postgresql? I'm writing a REST API endpoint that deals with a object that has a ForeignKey constraint to a parent object. In MySQL I can call an ALTER TABLE ADD FOREIGN KEY before I alter the data structure. This adds the constraint to the database before updating the object so it will not break. Is there a equivalent option in PostgreSQL
