Doorways: The Underworld is set in Hell. A demonic world, where a part of all your desires can be found. But they also come with a price. You must find and deliver her, so she can be judged by the devil and get his forgiveness. Otherwise the costs will be forever. Key Game Features Immersive storytelling Immersive atmosphere Horrifying exploration Intuitive puzzles Multiple endings Replayability Support for several controllers Support for the Oculus Rift If you have any question, don't hesitate to ask for support! --- All of this is accompanied by a beautiful soundscape.The audio design was handled by Luc Schoefs who had worked in his previous project the award-winning Our Man in Nepal. The composer, Toby Lammertink, is known for his work with Martin O'Donnell (Fahrenheit) and his album "Surface Truths" was chosen as the main theme of the game! --- Have fun! A: Undead There is an unnerving story about the drama in this world. The do and don't notice when there is something disturbing. There are several sneaking ways and only one driving ways to carry on. The creep factor is not desirable, however you can defend yourself with a weapon. There are many places where people meet their death, such as the prison, the mental hospital, and by suicide. There are 3 different endings and the overall game's atmosphere. What to know: The undead creature is rather perky than scary, but there is one. The area where it is lurking is very small and it is common everywhere. There is no real time limit. It is a very interesting game and worth to play. What's new in Looking For Imago:

'Finally - there's no time to lose!' Sophie cried. Sweat was oozing from every crevice on her brown skin frame. She was in a desperate rush - to sate her hunger. The youngling spasm's desire had suddenly shot up again, forcing her down a path to which she had no choice but to follow. Even her most logical defenses were being sabotaged by her base desire for blood - disrupting her every rational impulse, distorting her goals and intentions, and turning her into a bundle of instinctual, animalistic impulses - a starveling jackal. Her body swayed with the rhythm of music familiar to her. The first notes of the Spinners' song 'Cowgirl Yeah!' sung to the tune of 'He's so fine,' erupted from the speakers; the sound made her drool. But her mind wasn't on the music. The song was her rationale for being here. It's vulnerability, fearlessness and aggression were what made the elderly girls of Mystic Falls, were what redeemed her of the humanity that vampires had stripped away. They were the reason she no longer felt like a monster - even when she was compelled by thirst to rip the heart out of someone. Sophie McDaniel was looking for her place again. She was looking to be human. Sophie was seventeen, and had travelled on her own for several days to reach Mystic Falls. She woke up this morning in a local motel after being flat refused entry onto a bus that was scheduled to take her towards her new home. She spent the last couple of days drifting across borders and under bridges, meeting people, finding out why she had been round the world so early, and what she could do to stay alive and undead once she got there. Remaining hidden was now playing out to be her greatest challenge. She'd once believed vampires led a hard life, but now seeing how she could slip by vampire security - and shockingly, remain in good company - she questioned her current belief. The days that followed the meeting with Elena Gilbert had been an adventure in itself. Sophie was excited to meet the four girls from Southeastern - Excited and frustrated. Excited she could barely contain the vampire, destined to kill her in an attempt to throw her off the scent. Frustrated, she could but witness their inability to locate her. She wanted to be with them so badly - they couldn't
