With the support of hash table, the code can work faster than the previous solution, and the code is more. Can you help me to answer this question? A: The built-in hash table cannot support a large set of strings, if your strings are large, please read the following discussion to resolve this problem: How to improve the performance of a.NET hash table by adding strings while.NET uses chaining? Q: python class method without self I'm reading the python docs on class methods, and one thing is confusing me. Why must the class object be passed to the class method when there is no self parameter? class C: def __init__(self): self.x = 0 def

`setX(self, x): self.x = x`
`a = C()`
`a.setX(4)`
`print a.x`
The output is 0, even though I expected `a.x` to be set to 4. It seems to me that this is what is supposed to happen: `C.setX` is called on the class object, so it will first be dispatched to an instance of `C`, but there is no instance here, so it will be dispatched to `C` again. Why would the second call not just be a straight function call on the `C` class? A: It's just a special case. If we remove the `self` argument from the method definition, it works just like any other function:
`>>> C.setX`
`>>> C.setX(4)`
`>>> a.x`
4
A: Python functions always take `self` as the first parameter because when you define a function (including methods) you are defining a function object that you can call in an expression. If you remove the self parameter then you are just defining a function with the same name as the class which does not mean anything.

```
class C:
def __init__(self): self.x = 0
def setX(x): self.x = x
a = C()
a.setX(4)
print a.x # the function object C.setX # (the function
```
