.Q: How to get the path from within a file that is being edited in Vim? When I launch Vim, I want to write something such as ./foo Using exe or procfile or bash/zsh expansion, I want to add this to the command line in the invocation of Vim, so that it executes "foo" without me having to type it in. I'm not wedded to any particular solution. In principle, I'd like to use something that can be interpreted by Vim (i.e. exe or procfile). However, it is acceptable if there is a shell script that does that. The solution should work reasonably well for Linux, but I'm interested in whether there is a solution specific to OS X. So far, I've considered using GNU_EDITOR and an ed shell script; however, I'm not wedded to a solution that has to use a shell script. A: I highly recommend you use exe files for your script execution. They are very easily interpreted (unlike shell scripts) and are cross platform. The default Linux exe is an executable named vim provided by the Vim package. There are many others including gvim and pyvim available through the default repositories. Example exe script #!/usr/bin/env exe
