The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is restricted in many parts of the world, and can be limited by the government to 'sensitive' or 'special occasions' and other designated events. Eroded public space, such as parks, corridors, public squares, or parking lots, and even streets can be used for these purposes, even though they were intended for public use in the first place. A landmark example is the ban on peaceful assembly near Tiananmen Square in the Chinese city of Beijing. In April 2020, the Internet was censored in several Arab countries, including Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, purportedly to protect against the Covid-19 outbreak. In India, criminalising dissent has become a government policy for curbing dissent and is often invoked against those who take part in peaceful protests. Civil liberty and the idea that those subject to the state must be treated with respect and are not subject to arbitrary punishment is guaranteed by the rule of law and must be respected by the government. Examples of civil liberty include freedom of expression, of religion, of assembly, of the press, the privacy of communications and of association. The legal system must be impartial, independent of the executive and political influence, free from corruption, and protect and facilitate the right to defense of the citizenry. The rule of law establishes the principle of law rather than rule of power, and it insures that the government and individuals are treated equally and fairly by the state in all circumstances. A system of fair, impartial and transparent justice is an important component of a democratic society.

The majority of democratic regimes in the Global Monitor have serious measures in place for the protection of their citizens. Many institutions are, of course, highly politicized; for example, the Chinese regime has a Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission (CPPCC) to enforce the law. It has also been observed that, in authoritarian regimes, human rights are, more often than not, violated in a fragmented manner. This type of violation, which we refer to as state constitutionalism, is not a matter of individual rights to the fullest extent; rather, it affects the freedom of movements and protests, as well as the freedom of the press. In democratic regimes, when the state has taken power in a direct manner, the principal threat to rights is capture. This can take place when the state is privatized and lacks checks and balances. Moreover, under a dictatorship, the state is directly involved in violations and abuses, whereas under a democracy, these are the responsibility of the executive branch (also known as the government), which lacks the necessary resources to enforce the law. In democratic regimes, there is a separation between politics and law; the former is the responsibility of the legislature and the latter, by the courts. A democratic state also guarantees a public interest for private citizens. To do this, the state has the obligation to protect and promote the autonomy of the judiciary, the freedom of the press, and the right to protest. The three basic principles of democracy are equality, autonomy, and individual rights. The first of these has been, until the end of the twentieth century, of great concern only in the Global South. The second, in the Global South, has been the most vulnerable.

While autonomy is the main focus of this chapter, in which democracy is examined from an historical perspective, some of the more recent developments regarding individual rights are also discussed. For instance, freedom of expression is one of the most radical changes brought about by the evolution of democracy.
