The Magic Move tool is faster than using either the Move tool in Photoshop or the tool in Lightroom. It's extremely useful for any image where you don't want to cut out a section of it. It's more versatile than the Magic Wand tool in Photoshop when it comes to making selections. You can drag the slider to a value below the image and it'll select a random area for you. Not only does it simplify the process of making complex selections, you can easily remove objects by using the blob and eraser tool. To simplify cleaning up this task, you can right click on the background and use the Fill and Stroke with Blob tool. You can also find it in the Adjustments panel. Choose Gradient and the plugin will start generating a Gradient from the bottom point in that area and move upwards towards the top. You can smooth out the results manually or by using the tool as well. You need to press CTRL+D to activate the result. The tool is effective even with razor blades. The contextual tab menu displays tons of options that you can activate or deactivate. This is a very nice "speed dial" that allows you to dive right into the tools you need for the task at hand. The latest Photoshop updates aren't quite as radical as what we saw in the November update. This is partly because we had some problems shipping them. The changes in this release are incremental and are largely focused on improving previously shown features. The new Healing Brush tool is a powerhouse of a brush. It can fill and (optionally) edit the shape of holes and can even create a preset brush that can approximate cross-processing effects by adjusting the color of the surrounding area when the hole is filled. Point samples operate much like the trace scalpel tool, but have a much larger sample range. The release also introduces an Active Healing tool that works with the regular tool just as well. All the healing brushes are there, too.
