More particularly, it relates to a static random access memory which has a memory cell array including the combination of a plurality of memory cells arranged in a matrix of rows and columns and including a selection transistor for selecting the memory cell and a plurality of word lines arranged corresponding to the respective rows and comprising a control gate electrode and a drain region of the selection transistor, each of the memory cells comprising a semiconductor body having a main surface provided with a storage capacitor connected to the drain region of the selection transistor, a source region, an impurity diffused region having an opposite conductivity type from the source region, and a portion of the impurity diffused region being connected to the source region, a control gate electrode being provided on the side of the impurity diffused region of the memory cell and a word line connected to the control gate electrode. Such a static random access memory is known from U.S. Pat. No. 4,422,946. It describes a memory cell array comprising a selection transistor having a drain region connected to a bit line and a gate region in which a control gate electrode is disposed. A main surface of a semiconductor body of this memory cell has a storage capacitor in which a capacitor electrode is connected to the drain region. On the main surface of the semiconductor body is provided an impurity diffused region which is adjacent to the capacitor electrode and is connected to the source region of the selection transistor. When a memory cell of this type is formed, the impurity diffused region having the opposite conductivity type is firstly formed on the main surface of the semiconductor body. After this, the capacitor electrode is formed. Then, the memory cell is isolated from the remaining semiconductor surface by a protection region. Thereafter, the impurity diffused region is diffused to a predetermined depth into the semiconductor body. This allows the depletion region to reach the impurity diffused region having the opposite conductivity type. Consequently, the impurity diffused region is at a potential of the semiconductor body. Then, the selection transistor
