effects of the peroxisome proliferator perfluorooctanoate on cell cycle in culture.

Perfluorooctanoate (PFOA) is an environmental pollutant with estrogenic activity and is also a peroxisome proliferator. We have examined the effect of PFOA on cell cycle progression of primary rat hepatocytes in culture. PFOA at concentrations of 0.1 to 2 microM induced the early G1 arrest in primary hepatocyte cultures after a 48-hour exposure. PFOA did not induce nuclear or cytosolic levels of either the cyclins or their regulators p21 or p27. These results suggest that the G1 arrest might occur at the level of cyclin kinase inhibitors rather than cyclins. We also found that PFOA at 2.5 microM induced the death of hepatocytes in culture. This was accompanied by a significant induction of cell death-related genes and proteins including caspase-3. However, the accumulation of the senescence-associated beta-galactosidase, characteristic of irreversible growth arrest, was not observed. It is concluded that the G1 arrest is a result of the early disruption of protein synthesis at the translational level by PFOA. A variety of electronic devices, such as cellular telephones and personal digital assistants (PDAs), include cameras. In recent years, the resolution of these cameras has steadily increased, allowing more detail to be recorded. For example, in digital cameras, the amount of data recorded for each image can be greater than in analog cameras, thus making these digital cameras more practical. Some electronic devices include multiple cameras, which allows a user to capture different images of a subject. For example, a digital camera that includes a rear camera and a front camera can allow the user to capture a rear view and a front view of the same subject. During a typical usage, images captured by an electronic device may be stored in a memory device of the electronic device. The user may select to store the images in a particular order. For example, the user may choose to store the images in a particular order based on a time at which the images were taken. That is, if the user selects to store images at an initial time (e.g., 9 a.m.) and then stores images at a later time (e.g., 3 p.m.), the images taken at the later time will be stored after the images taken at the initial time. If a user does not select a particular order in which images are
