I am satisfied with Lightroom 5 and feel it was worth the upgrade. However, Adobe has a lot to answer for regarding the increasing file sizes/formats and the various signature enhancements it has introduced. Lightroom is still my preferred RAW software of choice. It does get the job done and makes file handling more task-efficient than many competitors' software. For example, I don't need to import RAW files into Bridge as often as I used to. I can pull images into Lightroom and start editing right away, or choose to work with modified JPEGs if I particularly like them. I'm glad I finally spent a few bucks on upgrading. I never expected Lightroom 5 to be a big leap over its predecessor. I expected it to be a small improvement on that program. Keyboard and mouse usage is just as intuitive as it was in the previous versions. It focuses on organically placing the tools you use most in the order that you use them most often. It makes sense. Kuler is great (if you really want), as is Smart Objects, which can be handy for creating templates. The new features are pretty let down, though. Overall, if you have Lightroom 4, you can certainly use Lightroom 5 and get the same functionality. The only disadvantage is that you'll have to mess around more with the registry to make it all work. I haven't actually needed to do so yet. I'm sure that thing will work the same way as it did in the past automatically, but you don't know until you try. At that point, you can also consider buying Lightroom 6, which is part of Photoshop. I don't think it's worth it, though. Lightroom 5 is a great addition to Lightroom 4. Lightroom 6 is a blatant desperate attempt to keep people who have already switched to Lightroom 5 with them.

It provides a window where a user can easily import, edit and choose between vector and raster images. The images can be edited in the browser window or directly in Photoshop without requiring a cloud connection. To keep things organized, users can import images, which automatically become part of Photoshop's Project panel. The first consideration in an edit, is what type of image you may be working on. If you are working on a PNG, you should consider the run length encoding in order to save some space by converting from pixel-based format to a vector-based one. If you are working on a JPEG, bit-depth reduction should also be considered. If you are working on an older format, you should consider to reduce the color depth of the file, for example when working with an 8-bit image. You may even reduce the quality of the image to save as much space as possible. If you are working on a RAW image, it can be transformed into a color space such as Adobe RGB using the Adobe DNG Converter, which should only be done after you have completed your edit. After your edit is finished, it is important to test the image, for example to make sure that the image works well with our preview. This process may include sending the image to a service such as Vecteezy to make sure that your edit renders correctly on a variety of social networks. After the edit is done, it is important to save the image in the format that is appropriate for the publication type, for example, PNG is the appropriate format for a web page, JPEG for a print, and PSD for a print or a company ID card. One of the most important features in Photoshop is the use of layers. The layer is like an organizational layer for your image. A layer can contain: text, line art, patterns, and a whole lot more. Once you have created your images and it is time to create your “card design”, you should always check to make sure that there is a design layer above your photograph layers and they are grouped there. As your image is formatted for printing, you should have no problems in saving. If you are creating a web page, you should make sure that the photograph is at the top of the design layers and, if the page is meant to be Mac formatted, you should also make sure that a background item is at the bottom of the layers. When you are finished with your edit, it is important that you are familiar with the “save for web” options. If you are working on a high resolution image for a company ID card or for print, the image will be exported to its greyscale version and a layout will be created in order to show the information on the card. If you are working on a web page, you should either export the image to your web page or if you are working on an online gallery, you should save the image and the elements of the image in order to save space. The best way to make sure that your website is optimally formatted is to export the web page to a PNG.

Adobe claims to have made this update only for the instant improvements, but we also want to see the customization abilities users can achieve with the tool. You can learn more about the Shadow mode updates on the Adobe Literacy site. In an age of social media, infographics are a great way to present information in a creative way.
