The movement of N and P from a waterbody into its biota can be influenced by a variety of factors. To evaluate the relative importance of these factors, we compared concentrations of N and P in tissue of individual biota between high- and low-nitrogen streams of eastern California, USA. The use of N-based native materials for stream habitat improvement produced additional concentrations of nitrogen and phosphorus in sediment, and nitrogen and phosphorus in invertebrates. Thus, the concentrations of N and P in biota of low-N streams were greater than those of high-N streams after the introduction of the artificial substrates. The mean concentrations of both nitrogen and phosphorus were greater in the benthic fraction of high-N stream sediments and the invertebrates of high-N stream biota than in the sediment and biota of low-N streams, respectively. The declines in invertebrate richness and mass in high-N streams may be due to a direct and/or indirect influence of nitrogen on the invertebrate community. An analysis of all amphibian, bivalve, and gastropod species was conducted to determine whether species that were most sensitive to nitrate were more limited by phosphorus. Although factors such as temperature and predator effects likely influence these species, there was no suggestion of any direct effects of P on abundances of these species.Memphis Bass The Memphis Bass (previously know as the Memphis Baron) was a bass guitar manufactured by Fender. The instrument was very similar to a Gibson J-bass, however, unlike the J-bass, the Memphis Bass has the usual Fender styling and a contrasting pickguard, a red pickguard on a classic gold finish of the 1960s. It was designed by Fender's head of instrument design, Erich Huels
