The first steps that I take with a new raw image are to check to see if the color rendering is nice and punchy. Adjustments like Curves/Gamma are applied here. I fix white balance if necessary, as well as the color temperature of the image. The white color balance is determined by looking at the sky and white balance control in Lightroom. Lightroom's sliders and buttons are simplified to make it easier to apply simple color corrections to large numbers of images in a hurry. Another handy function is the "+" button — it's the same as the + button in Photoshop. Lightroom makes it easy to open multiple images at once. It's fast, too. Image blending and processing are also straightforward. Lightroom is really easy to use and I'm usually looking at a lot of pictures as I go through processing steps — so it doesn't take too long to go through them. There's also a duplicate feature that lets you save preset processing settings so that you can apply the same settings to an entire folder of images with a single click. Unfortunately, Lightroom is not available for Mac users. There is no 64-bit version of this Adobe software and it's just not useful for current professional photographers when there are tools like Aperture and Photoshop that already do what Lightroom does. I would expect Adobe to be aware of this, but I suspect that Lightroom's birth is more a graphic design or marketing/Publishing/Metadata slant. Finally, a Lightroom update was released in the past few months, but there has been no Mac release yet.
