As per my understanding, for a given process (pid), read_mem(0, size, addr_offset, addr_mapping) that returns the mapped address in the specified memory chunk. get_mem_mapping(pid) will return the mapping info for all the memory mapped to the system by the process. For my problem, a particular process has been identified, in which the mapped memory is bigger than the chunk of memory I wish to inspect. I wish to verify if there are non mapped memory in the same region. The region size can be identified by the mapped memory chunk size, but I'm not sure how to proceed with verifying if any memory is unmapped. After visiting some websites and being redirected to some SO questions, I came up with one possible solution. size_t map_offset = 0, free_offset = 0; while (0 base + free_offset; // Finds the size of the next page page_size = free_offset + get_mem_mapping(pid)->size - map_offset; // Read the memory addr = read_mem(0, page_size, map_offset, free_offset); // Compare with the base address if the memory
