The spirally-built spacer can be mounted on top of an existing spacer that was constructed in a single round bend to hold the cards. The spirally-built spacer typically includes a small number of radially-extending legs which are connected to a central hub, and are fixed relative to the hub and each other. A disadvantage of a small number of legs is that the legs are not capable of adequately supporting the cards being held by the spacer because the weight of the cards puts a significant amount of stress on the legs. This can result in the legs bending, crimping, or breaking. Also, only a limited number of cards can be supported by each leg of the spacer. This is because the legs can only span an area of about one inch. Even though the cards are supported, they can still shift about and move somewhat due to the design of the system. Another disadvantage is that all of the legs are connected to
